Excerpt: . . . the room, and he hugged me when I came downstairs again. His heartiness and pleasure were, indeed, contagious. All the journey home I had been depressed, because, now that my little honeymoon was over, the thought that in a few days my husband would be saying good-bye came to me with cruel sharpness. But it was impossible to feel the cheery, hopeful influence of my fathers glad and affectionate welcome and remain dull. Indeed, the mere sight of him, with his jolly, red, beaming face, kind eyes, and winning smile was as good as a cordial, for he was not only inspiriting himself, but the thought he gave rise to in me was full of encouragement. I mean that he too had left his wife a score of times oftener than I meant that Richard should leave me; and yet here he was now,...
