Not illustrated. 1937 Excerpt: . . . their trade, drift in and droop over the piano, where the nimble fingers of a lean black man execute every trick of syncopation. The music seems to have a very singular effect upon those pale, wasted women, who gather there. First, they weep, as the song tells of sorrow and of suffering, and of other days, but as it grows faster and louder, they dash away their tears, throw their heads back and, with reckless laughter on their lips, move to the center of the floor and execute the pasamala, and other torrid diversions of the honky-tonk dancers. Then Beale Street is Blues Heaven to those women, who have strayed away from their Delta homes to have a fling at life where the blues began. The night echoes with the cries of a gay, carefree people, who pass along the streets in a never ending parade. The strumming of guitar players strolling down the street, with their girls singing to the accompaniment, blend with the traffic noises, to create short snatches of gaiety, such as Handy had heard flowing from the throbbing bosom of Blues Heaven. So this was Beale Street, the Blues Heaven that Aarons companion had told him about, when they were riding along in the box car towards Memphis! He walked slowly down Beale to Wellington where he stopped to watch a procession that was passing by, headed by a tall, pompous black man, dressed in a frock coat and a stovepipe hat set on one side of...
